

Exploitation in international relations refers to the act of using or taking advantage of someone or something for one's own benefit, often at the expense of others. This can take a number of forms, including economic exploitation, political exploitation, or cultural exploitation.

In the field of international relations, exploitation can occur between states, as well as between states and other actors such as multinational corporations or non-governmental organizations.

Some examples of exploitation in international relations include:

1. Economic exploitation: This can involve the exploitation of natural resources or labor in one country by another country or by multinational corporations.
2. Political exploitation: This can involve the use of political influence or coercion to advance the interests of one state or group at the expense of others.
3. Cultural exploitation: This can involve the exploitation of cultural resources or practices by another country or group, often for commercial gain.

Exploitation can have negative consequences for the countries or groups that are being exploited, and it can contribute to inequality and tension in international relations.
